Identify your teen's future goals and discuss what the world might be like 20, 30, or even 50 years down the road. Read the same book and talk about it. Plan a weekend trip. Go hiking. Watch a play. Develop a new healthy habit together, like exercising or writing in a gratitude journal. Attend a concert.

Ways to Spend Quality Time With Your Teenager

My son used to come to me and say, "Listen, Saturday night we're all going up to the lake. Is it okay if I go?" Saturday night was not his automatic night out. Instead, that was negotiated each week, and the answer wasn't always "Sure." As a parent, I think you should be saying, "What are your plans this weekend?"

One of my personal favorites is, "Maybe you do hate living here, but you still have to be home on time." What you're doing when you respond like this is effectively and gently challenging your child's poor behavior and helping him see that it isn't going to solve his problem, and then you're redirecting him to the task at hand.

Boundaries are healthy for you and those surrounding you. I cannot change my son's behavior by setting rules. Any success for me in dealing with my son's addiction is a result of setting good boundaries for myself. I choose where I want to go. I no longer allow my child with addiction to take me where he wishes to go.
